Overview

Lobuche East is one of the most popular “trekking peaks” in Nepal. Located conveniently next to the path to Everest Base Camp, Lobuche east is attempted by trekking groups who come to see the spectacular view of Mt. Everest and the Khumbu valley from its summit, as well as by serious 8000m mountaineers who use the peak for its acclimatization and practice benefits. The climb is relatively straight forward with few technical hurdles. Base Camp and high Camp both have ample space and reliable sources of water, allowing the climber to enjoy the mountain without worrying too much about the logistics.

Lobuche Peak;

Rising with a height of 6,119m in the famous Everest Region, Lobuche East Peak is a major climbing destination in Nepal.

The Nepalese Mountaineering Association categorizes it as a trekking peak, which means it is a comfortable peak. However, you can only climb this peak with some climbing preparation and training.

To tell you a fact about this peak, Lobuche East Peak has a sister peak known as Lobuche West(6,145m). The Lobuche West is more of a technical peak; hence, it is an expedition peak. A long and deep notched ridge separates the two sisters. The mountains got their current name, Lobuche, as they lie near Lobuche village, a small hamlet of Sherpas.

For the first time, Laurence Nielson, the first American to climb Mt Everest without bottled oxygen, and Sherpa Ang Gyalzen summited Lobuche East Peak on April 25, 1984. Since then, Lobuche East Peak has gradually been a notable peak for all climbers.
